Welcome!

This year’s introduction felt the toughest to write since I started writing these in 2021. How could I attempt to capture what’s happening in the local food system at this moment in time that would feel relevant for the year-long lifecycle of this publication?

Things are changing rapidly all around us; local newspapers closing, schools consolidating, new wars launching, gas and food prices rising, uncertainty around federal support of our most basic needs, sieges of American cities by our government, unjust arrests of so many people around the country, many who work in the food system. Not to mention major climate events. Where to focus?

So, when I happened upon a stack of dusty, crinkled Bon Appetit magazines from peak COVID era days, I rifled through them. Cooking fresh, gorgeous meals certainly helped many of us get through the pandemic, and getting creative in the kitchen continues to be a bright spot in my day, although these days, I’m hooked on Sami Tamimi and Yotam Ottolenghi cookbooks.

Imagine my surprise to find an incredibly relevant-to-today quote from a May 2021 issue. Written by London-based author and TV personality Yasmin Khan, the article was titled “Kitchens Without Borders” and focused on Khan’s travels to the eastern Mediterranean to document forcibly displaced peoples’ relationship with food.

Receiving inspiration from a five-year-old, not-exactly-envelope-pushing publication gave me pause. But there you have it, Khan wrote it clearly in black and white: “The climate crisis and food are connected... notably through migration. As changing weather patterns, rising sea levels, and environmental destruction lead to crop failures and food scarcity, large areas of the earth are steadily becoming uninhabitable, and people are being forced to move.”

It’s long been understood that migration is natural for animals; the return of the geese from warmer climes is a sure sign of springtime. Migration is also natural for people. Modern humans have been migrating for millennia, and, by some estimates, for millions of years. As a species, we’ve been driven by environmental and economic factors across continents, always. We’ve evolved to seek safety, food, stability. Many of us, along with our neighbors, arrived in Ndakina, now known as Vermont, for the same reasons.

Khan continued: “Climate migration will force us to reconsider how we live together, and it is my hope that it will also make us reassess our notions of man-made borders so that people can move in safety and live in dignity.”

It is undeniable that the climate crisis and its effects have arrived on our doorstep. I encourage our community to be courageous and open-hearted in these changing times. Let’s welcome diversity and foster safety for all of our neighbors.

Lastly, I invite you to use this Guide — our 16th edition — as a resource to see beyond (county) borders. Connect with, and show gratitude to, the 250 innovative, dedicated, and resilient producers and farmers in the Champlain Valley who continue to nourish our community day in and day out.

We are a community non-profit governed by a volunteer board whose mission is to promote the growth and health of local food and agriculture in Vermont's Champlain Valley.

Food and Farms

The Champlain Valley Guide to Local Food and Farms provides comprehensive information about our region's farms and serves as a year-round resource for buying local.

The Tour de Farms, the Champlain Valley's annual cycling and sampling tour of local farms, raises awareness of our county's bounty and promotes safe, sustainable transportation.

The Farmer Climate Network This network of farmers and community members collaborate to mitigate the risks and adapt to the opportunities that a changing climate presents.

Food Economy

A Food Hub that drives local food for the whole community. This space in Middlebury hosts the aggregation, storage and distribution of local food. We're increasing access to markets for producers and increasing access to local food for everyone.

ACORN's online market streamlines wholesale and bulk purchasing on an e-commerce platform. The market aggregates products from multiple local farms onto one invoice, making it easier to purchase local food. "A local foods Costco."

ACORN is a member of multiple statewide groups and communities of practice to ensure we remain connected with our colleagues in the regional foodshed and continue to identify new opportunities for growers and food producers in the Champlain Valley.

Community + Culture

We publish a monthly e-newsletter, Cultivating Connections, to inform our community about farm and food-related news. Sign up for the newsletter at www.ACORNVT.org. To submit content, email info@acornvt.org.

Eating as a Hopeful Act

BY ALYSSA GREANEY AND LINDSEY BERK

RISING COSTS AND CHANGES IN SUBSIDY PROGRAMS

It is becoming clear to ACORN, as well as other service providers in Vermont's food system, that it continues to be increasingly difficult to make the math work on farms. The cost of inputs required to grow food — seed, materials, and equipment — has risen sharply, squeezing margins and forcing farmers to make tough decisions about what is still viable. Everyday supplies and hard goods now have higher price tags, adding another layer of stress to already fragile farm budgets. Traditionally subsidized infrastructure, such as fencing, irrigation, high tunnels, and even organic certification costs, is facing potential cuts. These are supplements that farmers rely on to keep operations running. For now some programs are holding steady, but the foundation feels shaky.

Farmers describe a question mark not only around federal support but also customer demand. Customers are fickle; they appreciated local farms when grocery store shelves were bare during the pandemic, but their demand decreased when the supply chain stabilized. The marketplace, similarly, has been experiencing shifts for decades. Consolidation among distributors makes it harder for farmers to access markets. The corporate acquisition of multiple local distributors has led to more expensive, more competitive, and more complex onboarding processes for farmers, says Hannah of Blue Ledge Farm in Salisbury. Small scale farmers easily get left behind.

Costs are not just affecting farmers' businesses; they're seeping into their personal lives. Skyrocketing health insurance costs are forcing farmers to consider going without coverage entirely. With healthcare subsidies seeping away for many Vermonters, farmers have to decide what to prioritize.

CLIMATE CHANGE-DRIVEN CHALLENGES

It is undeniable that seasons no longer follow familiar patterns. Farmers are navigating droughts one year, flooding the next, and frequent unpredictable frosts. Ross Conrad, the beekeeper at Dancing Bee Honey in Middlebury, emphasized that farms aren't affected in a silo; the effects span the food system. "Beekeeping success is closely tied to the health and productivity of local farms. Farms are a source of income from pollination services provided and are often an important source of forage for bees. When local farmers suffer negative impacts from tariffs, climate extremes, and labor issues, beekeepers feel it. Reversing renewable energy and climate initiatives, loosening pesticide regulations, and cutbacks in research funding do not bode well for the future."

During the 2025 drought, Singing Cedars Farmstead in

Orwell hit the bottom of its well, forcing them to decide when and whether to water their tomatoes, their primary cash crop. Their main strategy to fortify their crops from climate change is "protected culture," finding new ways to grow the same crops they have been growing for years. This looks like more high tunnels, surface drainage, and a different irrigation system.

Jane, the farmer-owner at Sweet Roots Farm in Charlotte, says, "We can't make decisions based on the year before." She expressed the difficulty of planning in such uncertain times and emphasized that they try to maintain diversified operations with a mix of annuals and perennials, and keep an open mind when thinking long-term.

STRAIN ON OUR COMMUNITIES AND INSTITUTIONS

On top of the tangible economic and equipment-related losses, farmers describe another loss: community. Immigration crackdowns have driven away neighbors who once helped grow and share food. The loss of federal programs, including the Local Foods Promotion Program (LFPP) and Local Food for Schools (LFS), created yet another strain on the food system that once had support. Schools relied on LFS funding to purchase from local food entities, including ACORN. Without support, schools are left to decide if they have the budget and capacity to purchase local food or to go without. At a time when school budgets are already squeezed thin.

CONCLUSION

Farming is an inherently risky business, even in a stable economy, climate, and marketplace. Today, in this time of the Great Turning, as named by deep ecologist and systems thinker Joanna Macy, the risk is even greater. ACORN will continue to do what we can as a local food organization to support small and medium-scale farms to offset that risk. We will continue to develop the ACORN Food Hub to help stabilize institutional markets.

Outside of market-based solutions, ACORN advocates at the Vermont Statehouse and partners with statewide organizations, including Farm to Plate, Hunger Free Vermont, Rural Vermont, NOFA-VT, and the five other Vermont food hubs to strengthen our local agricultural network and push for more public support. ACORN also sees mutual aid as a key to this transitional period and hosts a Farmacy: Food is Medicine program, as well as farmer wellness days and working bees on farms.

There is no food security without farm viability.

There is no food security without farm viability.

There is no food security without farm viability.

— Becca Warren

Becca Warren, Manager of the Vermont Food Security Roadmap, had her own take on the topic, when she asked 300 people at the 2025 Farm to Plate conference to repeat this mantra repeatedly: “There is no food security without farm viability. There is no food security without farm viability.”

As the climate continues to change and federal funding and the marketplace remain unpredictable, ACORN will continue to cultivate community by hosting events, educating the public, and creating space for common ground. Wendell Berry memorably wrote, “Eating is an agricultural act,” which Michael Pollan later updated with “Eating is a political act.”

We say eating can also be an act of hope and resistance.

IN THEIR OWN WORDS

We checked in with those who spend their lives figuring out how to feed our community. We asked farmers if, and how, federal events have affected their businesses, and what have been the biggest impacts or concerns this year. These are a snapshot of their words, unedited, and anonymous to allow for full freedom of expression.

"The increased pricing of hard goods and supplies."

"Steep price increases in inputs have been a problem."

"The attack on undocumented folks & other immigrants has driven away and taken so many kind people who would otherwise be volunteering with us, growing food that often feeds underfed people for free. The climate crisis had made the need to save water and feed this precious land even more apparent."

"We can only grow so much before we need to have a different irrigation system. We maxed out the well last year, we got to the point where we decided we should stop watering."

"The biggest pressure I'm feeling right now is the cost of health insurance. It has become so expensive that I will likely have to go without it this year."

"Drought for winter feed, suspension of SNAP."

"I'm concerned about the mental health impacts within the agricultural community, including high rates of farmer suicide."

We appreciate the honest vulnerability of these statements and encourage readers to purchase locally whenever and wherever possible. We're all in this together!

Fresh flowers

Find your source for blooms in Addison County

BY SUSAN SMILEY

Many flowers grow in Addison County during the summer months. They grow in meadows, along roadsides, in home gardens, in commercial vegetable gardens and increasingly on farms that devote themselves exclusively to growing flowers to sell into diverse markets. The ever-strengthening impetus to grow and purchase our food locally has morphed into a desire to buy our flowers locally, abetted hugely by growers who are offering flowers to flower lovers in many new ways.

“Flowers bring people joy,” said V Smiley of Vermont Minifactory in Bristol. “It is a huge relief when we put out the first tulips, the first fresh flowers of the season. Customers take time to look at the bouquets we create every week and often take pictures of them. I have a fantastic supplier in Understory Farm in Bridport. They have been making weekly deliveries of buckets of flowers since 2018.” Customers who buy buckets of flowers from Rock Meadow Farm, Four Blooms Farm and Flower Power Farm fashion handmade bouquets that grace rooms full of wedding celebrants, family and friends of graduates and lucky party goers.

CSAs are an increasingly popular way to bring fresh flowers into your home weekly. Martha Hill of Cornwall, is a subscriber to Four Blooms Flower CSA. Beginning in December the Bristol flower producer delivers bouquets to a pickup spot in Middlebury for Martha and other subscribers. She particularly loves the orange single blooms. They last a week and can always be counted on to open fully, revealing the colors and patterns of the interior, bending engagingly beyond the vase’s rim. Understory Farm, Flour Blooms and Rock Meadow Farm in Hinesburg are among the flower farmers offering CSAs of

Community efforts ensure access to locally-grown produce

BY MARIN HOWELL

As another growing season unfolds in Addison County, community members across the region are working to ensure residents have access to locally-grown produce.

It's an effort that's supported by many hands — from farms and gleaners to gardeners and nonprofit organizations like Helping Overcome Poverty's Effects, known as HOPE.

HOPE Executive Director Jeanne Montrouss said the organization runs a large gleaning program, one that dozens of local farms participate in.

"They call us to bring trained groups of gleaners to their farms to harvest excess or unmarketable produce," she explained. "They also donate a large amount of produce that they have harvested themselves."

HOPE also purchases specific crops from farms and CSA shares for local families using grant funds. Along with farms, the organization receives produce and eggs from backyard gardeners.

Gleaning and distribution of local produce takes place during the harvest season, Montrouss said, which runs from May until early winter.

"Sometimes, a farmer will donate a winter storage crop later in the winter," she said. "We're hoping that some of this produce can be frozen or made into ready to eat meals that can be delivered in the off season."

Produce from local farms is brought back to HOPE, where it gets packaged and offered to community members using the organization's food shelf or delivered to residents and distribution spots around the county.

"We love to hear food shelf users trading tips and recipes for using the produce available to them," she said.

Montrouss said HOPE currently has nine food delivery routes, which are staffed by volunteer drivers.

"Volunteers also help to pick up donated food at farms, and deliver it to the various sites we serve," Montrouss said. "(We) glean and/or pick up at 28 farms, and deliver to over 20 recipient sites, which include childcare centers, medical offices, community hubs, and others."

Montrouss said the challenges faced by the organization in this work, similar to those faced by farmers, include climate and weather conditions.

"One year when there was a hailstorm when the apple crop was nearing harvest, we received a great deal of blemished apples," she said. "In years when fields are flooded, there is a reduction or even loss of crops. When the weather is benign, the crops are plentiful. It is, of course, unpredictable for the farmers."

One of the farms HOPE works with is Little Village Acres in Middlebury, which donates food grown and processed at the site to "the hungry, the homebound, and the homeless in our community." The initiative was started by former Vermont Coffee Company owner Paul Ralston.

After retiring during the height of the pandemic, Ralston said he knew he needed something to work on.

"I had spent a lot of my career in the food industry, and I knew a lot about food insecurity from doing that," he said. "I thought I could try to help fill a bit of the local void by growing food."

Ralston noted Little Village Acres is a restoration of a former dairy farm. Some of the land had been subdivided, with a remaining parcel consisting of around 10 acres, a barn built in 1928 and a few other outbuildings. Ralston purchased the property and has been working over the past few years to restore the buildings and regenerate the land for growing.

"We have a large composting operation; we clean barns in and around our farm and we compost (horse and dairy) farm manure," he said.

Ralston was also inspired to build a processing facility at the site, which offers a space to prepare food for freezing or canning and ensure its available throughout the year.

The farm grows a variety of vegetables.

"Each year we sit down with members of the food shelf community in Addison County and find out what vegetables they would like us to grow, what's in demand," Ralston explained. "Most of what we grow are storage vegetables, like potatoes, squash, onions, garlic."

Last year, the farm also grew 500 tomato plants and over 500 cabbage plants. Little Village Acres produced around 5,000 pounds of vegetables in its first year, Ralston said. That total grew to about 8,000 pounds in the farm's second year and reached a little over 10,000 pounds last year.

"This year we're making a substantial expansion, so I'm hoping that we'll have even more," he said.

He noted the farm is located on what was formerly the Dow Farm property and sits next to a body of water called Dow Pond.

"That pond is waters of the state, and we are allowed to draw water out of that pond to irrigate our crops," he said, something that varying lengths, all offering a changing array of flower types as spring moves to summer and summer to fall. Pickup points dot the Champlain Valley.

One of the new delights of the burgeoning flower business is the availability of flowers for sale in expected and unexpected locations. Lantman’s Market in Hinesburg has long had a fresh flower section in the store and has been stocking it with local flowers for the past five years. Jen, the store’s flower buyer, has noticed that customers come over to see what new bouquets are on offer. The flowers are fresher and the producers are reliable and attentive. Last minute orders from the store are easily filled and Jen enjoys having a relationship with the growers.

Locally grown bouquets can be purchased at stores such as Lantman’s in Hinesburg, Gilfeathers in Ferrisburgh, the Middlebury Natural Foods Store and in general stores around the county.

The circle is closed by the Champlain Valley’s florists and floral designers who, while they order from floral supply businesses, turn to local flower growers also. Scentsations in Bristol has summer blooms their walk-in customers expect to see in their own gardens. They use these locally grown zinnias, lilies and snap dragons for small weddings and to amplify family celebrations.

Food access continued from page 11

came in handy during last year's severe drought. "We were able to have a really good crop year because we could irrigate."

A facility at the site provides Little Village Acres a spot to wash, sort, and pack vegetables grown at the farm along with vegetables gleaned from other farms.

"We are able to take in vegetables from neighbor farms that aren't suitable for sale but are still fit for human consumption, but they need to be washed, they need to be sorted because sometimes there's rot or mold or things like that," he said. "Then we pack them and store them and they get distributed into the food shelves."

Little Village Acres donated food to 22 organizations in Addison County last year, Ralston said.

"That's food shelves, shelters, church groups, senior center, community nonprofits," he said.

The Little Village Acres team includes two full-time and two part-time employees, as well as many volunteers from local service organizations, Middlebury College sports teams, high school sports teams, Addison County Home Health and Hospice and other groups.

Those volunteers are organized through HOPE. Ralston said the farm had around 40 volunteers helping out throughout the summer last year.

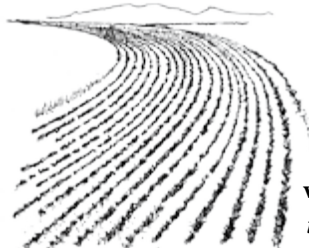

"There's just nothing more satisfying than to know that our hard work helps put food on the table for folks," he said.

And that work continues. Little Village Acres in April was getting ready for another growing season.

"We're starting our process now of spreading last year's compost, and getting ready for planting, which will start probably towards the end of May," Ralston said.

11. Blossoms® Honey

Fred Putnam, Jr. | Brandon | 802-247-3323

countryblossomshoney@gmail.com | countryblossomshoney.com

Country Blossoms® raw honey comes from sweet nectar in country wildflower blossoms right here in rural Vermont. Our honey is never heated or filtered nor is it ever adulterated by adding anything to it (the definition of raw honey); it comes straight from our own hives just as our bees made it. We never use antibiotics or synthetic pesticides in our hives; our methods are strictly organic. We have several seasonal varieties of raw honey (listed on our website).

PRODUCTS: Sweet corn, liquid and crystallized honey, creamed honey, honeybee nucleus colonies, cut comb and comb honey, beeswax and beeswax candles, honey favors for weddings, parties, and other events

AVAILABLE: Morningside Bakery and Pizza, Brandon, VT; Crossman's General Store, Middletown Springs, VT; LeClair Acres Farmstand, Claremont, NH; and direct from us. We ship anywhere in the country.

SERVICES: Swarm removal, educational workshops for new and prospective beekeepers. Educational blog on our website

Lyn Des Maris owns Des Marais Farm in Brandon with her husband. She said, “We’re strong conservationists of land and wildlife and clean water . . . We also love farms and farming, so we’ve always tried to balance the needs of one against the other.” She noted conservation is part of succession planning for Des Marais Farm, ensuring it’s manageable for the next generation.

CONSERVATION helps protect productive farmland

BY MARIN HOWELL

Growing up on a small farm outside of Manchester, N.H., Loren Wood often saw the land that became available in the area developed into housing. It was a sight that stuck with him after his family moved to Vermont and started Woodnotch Farms in Shoreham over 50 years ago.

“That’s not something I ever wanted to see happen here,” Wood said. “Beautiful, open farmland was getting to be less and less available there.”

Protecting such farmland was important to Wood’s family, and something they chose to pursue at Woodnotch Farms. The family has conserved its farmland — around 4,200 acres now comprised of dairy farms in Shoreham, Orwell and Addison.

Farm conservation with organizations like Vermont Land Trust (VLT) offers a way for landowners like the Woods to protect their agricultural land from future development. According to the VLT website, through conservation, land is “permanently protected in exchange for the sale (or donation) of development rights and other environmental protections.”

When navigating that process, farmers in the Champlain Valley have often worked with Al Karnatz, a project director with VLT who has helped conserve 400 farms in the region.

It’s a process that typically takes at least two years and begins with determining whether the property is a good first for farmland conservation. Once that determination is made, the VLT team can help farmers apply for funds, along with related work like determining the size and value of their conservation easement, “(managing) the legal process, and (writing) any management plans needed for funding.”

Through the process, farmland is conserved with a legal document known as a conservation easement, often held by a land trust like VLT. That document “permanently limits development, restricts subdivision, and protects natural resources. This is also known as ‘sale of development rights,’ as landowners are usually compensated for the loss of the potential income from development (though some donate or partially donate this value),” Vermont Farm to Plate states.

Conservation is a step that’s been taken by many farmers around the state. According to Vermont Farm to Plate, 15-20% of the state’s farmland has been permanently conserved in recent decades. The organization pointed to the opportunity to continue supporting farm viability, particularly as hundreds of Vermont farms change hands in the years to come.

“If managed strategically, these transfers could lead to the next generation of vital farms and strengthen Vermont’s rural economies,” states a Vermont Food System Plan Issue Brief on farmland conservation. “If not, land farmed for generations could sit fallow, become less productive, or be lost to development.”

The brief highlighted various gaps and opportunities in farmland conservation around the state, ultimately arguing that more tools and resources are required to keep up with current and anticipated demand, as well as “ensure that conserved farms stay in active agriculture and remain economically viable.”

“Vermont needs well-funded, coordinated programs, including land conservation, to support the transition of farmland and farm businesses in Vermont,” the brief reads. “Ultimately, successful farmland conservation strengthens both community vitality and farm viability.”

Wood’s family conserved its home farm in Shoreham in the 1980s.

“When we got here and had the opportunity to make sure that it stayed that way, that was something that was important to us,”

Wood recalled.

Over the years, Woodnotch Farms has grown from milking 40 cows to between 2,700-2,800 today. It continues to be a family operation, with Wood running the farms with his wife and four grown sons.

Farm conservation can help tackle various goals in addition to protecting agricultural land, such as helping farmers improve water and soil health or buy farmland.

Wood noted that conservation helped him and his wife add the Orwell farm to their operation by bringing down the purchase price.

“It helped us a lot, and it made me feel good to do it,” he said.

The VLT team has supported other area farmers in purchasing land and getting their own farms started through conservation projects. Those projects have included the conservation of 300 acres in Bristol at Abby and Trent Roleau’s diversified farm and with Jon Lucas of Orwell’s Lucas Dairy Farm.

Wood noted a lot of farmland has been conserved in the region, including in the towns of Shoreham, Orwell, Bridport and Addison. Those properties include Harrison’s Homegrown, where dairy farmers Melanie and Pat Harrison have conserved over 400 acres with VLT.

Numerous other farmers in the county have conserved their agricultural land with the land trust, from Monument Farms in Weybridge to Salisbury’s Blue Ledge Farm and Champlain Orchards in Shoreham, to name a few. Conserved farmland in the area represents a diverse range of farming operations and family-run businesses.

Seeing such properties protected and knowing they’ll remain open farmland for future generations is heartening for Wood.

“It’ll always be there, and that makes me really happy,” he said.

“Vermont needs well-funded, coordinated programs, including land conservation, to support the transition of farmland and farm businesses in Vermont ... Ultimately, successful farmland conservation strengthens both community vitality and farm viability.”

2026 UPDATE

In 2026, the ACORN Food Hub is celebrating its fourth year in operation! A natural extension of ACORN's mission, the Food Hub offers a wholesale market, storage, trucking, and cross-docking; essential services and connections that support our community of farmers and food producers.

Since our opening in the fall of 2022, we've grown and accomplished a lot! Our team of one part-time staff person has grown to a team of four and now includes two refrigerated delivery vehicles, four walk-in coolers/freezers, offices, and a fully fitted out warehouse featuring a beautiful mural on Exchange Street.

At the core of our work is a commitment to local food access and farm viability. We built the Food Hub and Online Market to serve buyers who are looking to source local food more easily and to make it possible for farmers to conveniently access new markets for their products

The Kestrel Knoll

A Reflection on the Myths of Nativeness

BY CHANGCHANG MA

Middlebury College (Class of 2026, Environmental Studies and Anthropology)

Soaring against the southern wind and taking an elegant pause in air, the Northern harrier completes her rhythmic ritual before diving right down to fetch the rodents in the hay field, riding the air current swirls right above the “Kestrel Knoll.” On this mount sits the Knoll, Middlebury College’s student-run educational garden and a mindful space of contemplation, healing, grief, and joy.

Humans have a long history of land management, and farmers have spent years keeping weeds out of their fields. However, “weeds,” or unwanted plants who emerged in spaces where humans designate one species to thrive and others to be removed, implies strong connotations. Tomatillos (green, spicy husk tomatoes that are a core ingredient to salsa verde) are cultivated and well cherished at the Knoll. Yet, as their generous offering allows them to spread wildly across the garden, a celebrated crop in one garden bed becomes a weed that needs to be eliminated in another. The very definition of weed, thus, is imbued with the human desire to order and manipulate land; only resources at the right moment and right space deserve to exist.

Similarly, the constructed meaning of invasive species also bears racial and cultural implications, as the pervasive discourse of “war against invasive species” continues. But what exactly is the native landscape we aim to preserve? Invasive species are not a recent phenomenon. Since European colonial times, the land of Ndakinna has been invaded by cattle, sheep, wheat, and rye, followed by numerous more as millions of European immigrants arrived. This flora and fauna, whether introduced intentionally or unintentionally, has changed the native landscape since their arrival. Nevertheless, the emerging contemporary native plant advocacy is often charged with militaristic terms, raising concerns around an eco-xenophobic botanical nativism and a seizure of nativeness and indigeneity by Anglo-Americans, where in reality, the nativeness of the land has been ever changing with waves of immigration.

Who defines nativeness and who belongs? Who is portrayed as invasive that needs to be terminated and weeded out? The land of Kestel Knoll is far from “native.” It is populated with non-native “weeds” such as quackgrass, dandelions, and thistles, alongside cultivated non-native crops like napa cabbage, mulukhiyah, epazote, and gochu peppers. Perhaps what the yearning for imagined nativeness truly reflects is our greed for control, constantly nurtured by the fear of uncertainty and parochial notion of us versus others.

ACORN: Increasing Food Access and Farm Viability at the Same Time

“There is no food security without farm viability.”

- Becca Warren, VT Food Security Roadmap Coalition Manager

Over the last five years, ACORN has honed in on where it can best serve the community: at the intersection between local food access and farm viability. As extreme weather patterns and corporate consolidation across the supply chain continue to put pressure on small and medium sized farms, the cost of food has also risen dramatically. ACORN’s two cornerstone programs, the ACORN Food Hub and Farmacy: Food is Medicine, serve to meet this increasingly challenging landscape by providing increased market access to farms as well as improved local food access to the community at large.

FARMACY

Market Access

Every spring, ACORN contracts with 3-4 local Organic farms for summer CSAs. Farms are paid their true wholesale price at the onset of the season. Over the span of 8 years, ACORN has paid farmers $300,000.

The Food Hub increases market access for over 60 farms and food producers by hosting an online market, a warehouse for cold and dry storage and delivery vehicles for distribution.

Food Access

Farmacy families are enrolled via referral from Porter Medical Center, HOPE, WIC, YouFirst, Village Health, or word of mouth. For 15 weeks in the summer, 100 families receive a CSA share with 9 unique fruits and vegetables. Over winter, monthly shares include vegetables and protein. Free nutrient-dense food is a win for our whole community!

Over 130 buyers including chefs, grocery stores, school food service directors, farmers, and community members have purchased from the ACORN market, spending more than half a million dollars ($565,000) over the last three and a half years. Here’s to getting more local food in our neighbors’ homes!

ACORN is working towards real, systemic change. We envision a world where farmers and farm workers receive dignified wages, the land, water and animals are treated with care, and all members of our community have access to the foods they want to eat.
